This is Phil Arnott for community comment on K INS radio.

In my last community comment I spoke about the watchdog group called judicial watch and the litigation that they have been involved in with our federal government because of the government's refusal to turn over on classified documents through the freedom of information act.

The second lawsuit filed by judicial watch seeks any and all records of communication including, but not limited to electronic communications between any officer or employee of the centers for consumer information and insurance oversight with the Department of Health and human services or the executive office of the president regarding the policy that was adopted called the hard ship exemption.

The hardship exemption is being granted to millions of Americans to allow them to avoid paying tax penalties for failing to comply with the Obama care individual mandate. This was a unilateral and significant change that the Obama administration has made in the new healthcare takeover.

The question comes up as to why would the Obama administration offer exemptions to a mandate it has described as essential to the entire purpose of the health care overhaul. According to Tom Fitton president of judicial watch, it's all about politics.

The 2nd lawsuit is one where action
Judicial watch is representing a Dr. Larry Kawa in a lawsuit filed against the US Department of treasury and the Internal Revenue Service. The lawsuit was dismissed after the court ruled in favor of Internal Revenue Service and now judicial watch has taken an appeal. Dr. Kawa's orthodontic clinic is a large
